A Place of Royalty

Hawai'i is the only state in the U.S. with a royal tradition. For centuries after the islands were settled, the people were ruled by ali'i, whose reach encompassed their home districts and often the entire island. A code of laws called kapu was strictly adhered to. It was not until 1810, when King Kamehameha I (Kamehameha the Great), who was born on the island of Hawai'i, brought all the islands together under a united ruler.

His rule, and that of his successors, shaped much of the Hawaiian culture that we know today, and that royal lineage is embraced and celebrated at Waikoloa Beach Resort in many ways.

A gathering place for many generations of Hawaiians, the first inhabitants of the area called Waikoloa are thought to have arrived and settled near 'Anaeho'omalū Bay as early as the late AD800s or early AD900s. By the middle of the 19th century, 'Anaeho'omalū had come to be regarded as part of the royal inheritance passed down from King Kamehameha I to his descendants, and the lands and fishponds were largely reserved for use by the royal family.

In that context, today's place names at Waikoloa Beach Resort, such as "Kings' Shops," "Queens' MarketPlace," and "Kings' Golf Course," are more than just casual uses of the royal reference, but are historically accurate indicators of the heritage of the land.

Waikoloa Beach Resort has memorialized Hawai'i's beloved royalty with a series of descriptive bronze plaques that visitors can find in various locations around Kings' Shops and Queens' MarketPlace. They include:

King Kamehameha I (1758-1819)

Born in Kohala in 1758, Kamehameha the Great united all the major islands under one rule in 1810. Not only did he distinguish himself as a fierce warrior, he was known as a wise and compassionate leader of his people.

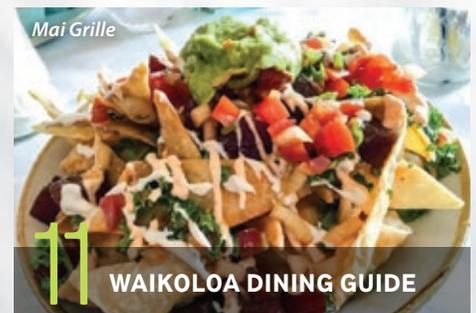

Kuhina Nui Ka'ahumanu (1768-1832)

Born into royal lineage, Ka'ahumanu married Kamehameha I as a young girl and grew to become his favorite wife. Through her influence, she persuaded King Kamehameha II to break the 'ai kapu (law) by eating with her in public.

High Chiefess Keopuolani (1778-1823)

This chiefess of the highest rank was also the wife of Kamehameha I, and mother of King Kamehameha II, King Kamehameha III, and Princess Nahi'ena'ena. Even her husband lowered himself in her presence. There are no recorded images of her.

Kamehameha II (1797-1824)

Liholiho ascended the throne at a time of great change in the islands due to foreign influences. It was during his reign that the kapu system of laws was abolished, the missionaries arrived bringing Christianity, education, and the printing press, and whaling and the sandalwood trade fully took hold.

Queen Victoria Kamamalu (1802-1824)

The daughter of Kamehameha I, also known as Tamehamalu, Victoria married Liholiho Kamehameha II. The couple contracted measles after paying a state visit to King George IV in London and consequently died. They had no children.

Kamehameha III (1813-1854)

Kauikeaouli was a strong leader who contributed many reforms during his 30-year reign, the longest of any of Hawai'i's rulers. His mild manner, good judgement, and solid character made him greatly respected by his people.

Queen Kalama (1817-1870)

The daughter of royalty, Queen Kalama married Kauikeaouli Kamehameha III, who introduced the division and disbursement of traditional lands known as the "Great Mahele." Queen Kalama greatly supported Hawai'i's first public school system.

Princess Bernice Pauahi Bishop (1831-1884)

Betrothed to her cousin King Kamehameha V, she chose instead to marry Charles Reed Bishop. After her passing in 1884, Pauahi left her vast estate to benefit the Hawaiian people through the founding of Kamehameha Schools.

Kamehameha IV (1834-1863)

Alexander Liholiho, grandson of Kamehameha the Great, brought great appreciation for etiquette and ceremony to his court. He and his wife, Emma Rooke, were greatly concerned about the health of their people, and established Queens Hospital on O'ahu.

Queen Emma (1836-1885)

The grand-niece of Kamehameha I and granddaughter of John Young, his royal advisor, Emma married Kamehameha IV. The couple had one son, Prince Albert, who died at the age of 4. She founded the Queen's Medical Center in Honolulu.

Kamehameha V (1830-1872)

Lot Kamehameha favored a stronger monarchy and placed much of the power back into the hands of royalty. He was the last ruler to bear the name of the great conqueror, and is credited with many public improvements and acquisition of land.

William Charles Lunalilo (1835-1874)

The grandson of a half-brother of Kamehameha the Great, Lunalilo became the first king to be elected. He was well educated and very popular with the people, and became the first Hawaiian to leave his property to charity.

David Kalakaua (1836-1891)

Well educated and able to speak fluent English, Kalakaua — the Merrie Monarch, after whom the Merrie Monarch Festival is named — was considered a gentleman, yet freely mingled among all levels of society. He restored the native hula to prominence and encouraged a revival in island musical tradition.

Queen Kapi'olani (1834-1899)

The granddaughter of Kaumuali'i, the last king of Kaua'i, Kapi'olani married King David Kalakaua in 1863. Her concern for Hawai'i's dying population led her to establish a maternity hospital, now known as Kapi'olani Medical Center for Women & Children.

Queen Lili'uokalani (1838-1917)

Sister to King Kalakaua, Lili'uokalani was the beloved last reigning sovereign of Hawai'i. Declared heir apparent in 1877, she ascended the throne in 1891, just two years before the overthrow of the monarchy. She also composed many songs, including "Aloha Oe," perhaps the best known Hawaiian melody.

PLAYING LESSONS WITH BOB MAY

The chance to play 18 holes to work on your game with a renowned PGA Tour player is exciting in and of itself. But when that player is Bob May, who famously pushed Tiger Woods to a three-hole playoff in the 2000 PGA Championship at Valhalla, and the course is Waikoloa Kings', the experience is even more special.

The playoff ultimately went to Woods, but the golf world never forgot May's tenacious play that day. As you go around the course with May as your mentor and instructor, you'll understand why he was so well respected on Tour, and why his extensive knowledge of the swing is sought after and prized today. And if you ask, you're sure to get some great stories along with expert swing coaching.

May is a proponent of the "swing the handle" method of teaching, which he learned as a junior golfer in Southern California, where at age 11 he began taking lessons from the legendary "Little Pro," Eddie Merrins, at Bel-Air Country Club. Merrins saw something special in the young man, as he devoted every Sunday morning to giving May lessons.

"The method I teach, which I learned from Little Pro, is simple, but effective. It is, 'swing the handle, not the club head,'" May said. "If you get your hands set on the club the right way, and move it with the right muscles, which are the forearms, it'll get you in the right position without really thinking about it. It will naturally happen. The big muscles follow the forearms. The forearms are connected to the hands which are connected to the handle. If we get the handle moving with the forearms, everything else is going to follow."

There's only a short time left to take advantage of the opportunity to get golf lessons from Bob May, noted instructor and former PGA Tour pro. May will be at Waikoloa Beach Resort through July 15, offering island golfers and resort guests a chance to learn from the man who "schooled" Tiger Woods in the 2000 PGA Championship at Valhalla.

May's approach to teaching includes both the physical and mental aspects of the game, and is geared to all players, from accomplished sticks to high-handicap players to juniors. From fundamentals to finesse, May's instruction is inspired by and emphasizes the importance of what he calls "a passion for the game."

May will be giving private hourly lessons for adults, juniors, couples, as well as nine-hole playing lessons. Using the Trackman swing performance analysis, May will tune up your swing and provide his unique insights into how to be successful on the golf course, based on his more than 20 years of experience on Tour.
