Makali'i

Creating Community with a Single Canoe

When the Polynesian Voyaging Society first sailed the double-hulled voyaging canoe (wa'a kaulua) Hōkūle'a to Tahiti in 1976 — the first such canoe built in Hawai'i in many generations — it set in motion a re-discovery of ancient knowledge held by the oldest cultures in the Pacific, a quest that is still ongoing today.

This past June, when the canoe returned to Honolulu from its most recent voyage — a three-year, round-the-world journey themed Malama Honua — it was clear from the large crowds gathered at Magic Island and statewide television coverage that the support for and interest in Hōkūle'a has only intensified over the years.

Hawai'i Island's own voyaging canoe, Makali'i, sailed to O'ahu to welcome Hōkūle'a home, with a crew that included expert navigator (pwo) Chadd Paishon.

"We've learned so much from our voyages," says Paishon, who joined the Polynesian Voyaging Society in the apprentice navigator program in 1990, was a crew member on the Hōkūle'a's 1992 voyage to Tahiti, and today is a senior captain of Na Kalai Wa'a Moku o Hawai'i, Hawai'i Island's own voyaging society.

"Above all, we've learned that we are all one community, from the ocean to the upcountry, and that we must depend upon and support one another for us all to flourish. Our ancestors brought everything with them," Paishon says. "They brought their foods, their values, their culture, their spirituality. They were self-sustaining, both on the sea and on the land. In this way, this canoe speaks of where we come from. Those are the lessons we are now teaching to the next generations."

PROVISIONING THE FUTURE

One of the ways Paishon and Na Kalai Wa'a Moku o Hawai'i is passing on this knowledge is by working with local schools — 10 of them — both in the classroom and in the school gardens, on a provisioning program for the Makali'i's planned 2019 voyage to the Northwest Hawaiian Islands.

"I asked the schools, 'Is it possible to provision one canoe ... 14 people for 30 days?'" Paishon says. "I asked them to grow the foods that do well in their communities, whether it be Waikoloa, Hawi, or Honokaa. This is what our ancestors did when they would voyage, and in so doing we are bringing the entire community together.

"The wa'a belongs to the community," Paishon says. "And without the community the wa'a would not exist."

Paishon says that in many ways, when the canoe is at sea, it is a microcosm of Hawai'i Island itself. "This is us," he says, "right on the deck of the canoe, we are a tiny floating island. We take care of one another. And it's no different when we get back to the island. We have an obligation to one another."

That message, delivered in classrooms and talks throughout the island, is Paishon's passion. "If we can provision one canoe," he asks, "why can't we then provision our entire island? Through the canoe we are creating a model for the island to act as one community, in order to sustain itself in both food and humanitarian ways."

sailing canoe using completely natural materials in the traditional practices of old Hawai'i.

That vessel, named Mauloa, was completed in 1991 under the guidance of Papa Mau Piailug, the Micronesian master navigator who was instrumental in teaching the original Hōkūle'a crew how to navigate by the stars and other traditional canoe knowledge, dance, and ceremony.

"What building Mauloa showed was how a canoe begins in the forest," Paishon says, "and gave us a complete picture of what it takes. You must pick the right tree, then there are blessings and ceremonies before you can take the tree. There is a right way to bring the rough-hewn log down to the water to construct the canoe, and finally there is a ceremony when it is birthed into the ocean."

After Mauloa was successfully built, the group began work on Makali'i, which launched in 1995, and made her maiden voyage to Tahiti that same year. Twenty-two years later, Makali'i, through the efforts of Paishon and Na Kalai Wa'a Moku o Hawai'i, is still bringing the Hawai'i Island community together, and teaching the traditional ways of the Hawaiian people.

"We continue to voyage," says Paishon, "so the stories will be written and voyaging will continue. But for us, it's not only about the canoe, but about sustaining our island for generations beyond us."

"We continue to voyage," says Paishon, "so the stories will be written and voyaging will continue. But for us, it's not only about the canoe, but about sustaining our island for generations beyond us."

INSET PHOTO ABOVE: Chadd Paishon is active in school outreach programs, using the Makali'i as an example of how to bring the whole island together as one community.

ONE ISLAND, ONE COMMUNITY

In 1976, Hōkūle'a was the only active voyaging canoe in the Pacific; today there are eight in Hawai'i, and 22 total throughout Polynesia and the Pacific. That's how strong the message was when Hōkūle'a first sailed, and how deep the yearning for traditional knowledge had become.

In the years after that first and subsequent voyages, Paishon says, "Everyone wanted Hōkūle'a to come to their communities so they could be part of the experience and learn the lessons for themselves. But since there was only one canoe, she couldn't come."

So, in the early 1990s, a group of Hawai'i Island residents — including Clay Bertelmann, his daughter Pomai, brother Shorty, Paishon, and others, many veterans of Hōkūle'a voyages — began an effort to build a wa'a kaulua for their own island. To gain knowledge of the customary practices of building a canoe, they were tasked with building a smaller, five-man coastal
